Part-time lecturer in Archaeology and PhD student at Orkney College since 2006, prior to this worked in the commercial, education and government sectors as a field archaeologist and geophysical surveyor. PhD research focuses on the role and importance of natural, cultural and architectural space in the landscape as a medium for the creation of social structure and identity in Orkney during the Later Bronze Age and Iron Age. Other research interests include the British Iron Age (in particular Atlantic Scotland) and theoretical and methodological approaches to field survey and landscape archaeology.
